THE SHEEN CODE

BY BACALEM JOTACAHOS

Inspired by https://familyoftaygeta.com

“The day of the apocalypse, the day when half of humanity will discover its true nature, is drawing ever closer.”

Copyright © 2026 Bacalem Jotacahos

All rights reserved.

No part of this work may be reproduced, in whole or in part, by any means without the author's written permission.

This work is a product of the author's imagination. Names, characters, places, and events are either the result of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously.

Any resemblance to real persons, living or dead, or to actual events is purely coincidental.

The English version of this book is available for free on the website:
https://thesheencode.com

INDICE

AUTHOR'S NOTE....4
DEDICATION....5
CHAPTER 1....6
CHAPTER 2....10
CHAPTER 3....16
CHAPTER 4....26
CHAPTER 5....34
CHAPTER 6....38
CHAPTER 7....42
CHAPTER 8....45
CHAPTER 9....51
SADHANA OF SHIFT....56

AUTHOR'S NOTE

For the writing of this book, I was deeply inspired by the work of Judith and Michael, also known as Aya and Kabamur.

I have done my best to follow, with the utmost respect and fidelity, the messages shared on the website https://familyoftaygeta.com/, integrating them with reflections and insights from my own personal spiritual studies.

It is important to clarify that while the story told in this book is entirely fictional and the result of my creative imagination, I personally consider the content shared on the website to be true and authentic. The fictional narrative serves only to explore and express those truths through storytelling.

DEDICATION

I dedicate this book to Ayu Kheandro — without his love, I would still be lost;

I dedicate this book to Ramana Maharshi — without his teachings on self-inquiry, I would not have known that one must focus on the source of "I" thought;

I dedicate this book to Eckhart Tolle — without his teachings on the Inner Body, I would not have known that, while one gently focuses attention on the thought "I," one must simultaneously feel the whole body from within;

I dedicate this book to Nisargadatta — without his teachings, I would not have known that one must meditate on the meditator, watch oneself as one observes their thoughts, observe oneself while perceiving the whole body from within, and seek the one who meditates;

I dedicate this book to Yogananda, to his master Yukteswar, to his master's master Lahiri Mahasaya, and to the avatar of light Mahavatar Babaji. Without the chapter "The Resurrection of Sri Yukteswar", the mysteries of the universe would not have reached this dimension;

I dedicate this book to Judith and Michael, also known as Aya and Kabamur, for the incredible work they have done and continue to do. Without their dedication and perseverance, humanity would be entirely unprepared to face the Shift.

CHAPTER 1

It was 3:30 in the morning, and Aya was meditating. Outside, it was still dark, and she was sitting in a soft, comfortable armchair that nevertheless allowed her to keep her back perfectly straight. With her eyes closed, she felt her whole body from within as a single field of energy. Her awareness was spread throughout her body, so present that it filled every single cell. Her attention was entirely turned inward, toward the inner space of the body, perceived as a unified sensation — it was as if only the surface of her skin existed, while the inside was empty. She was that conscious emptiness.

During her practice, Aya simultaneously focused her attention on the thought "I," following the guidance of a little rhyme she had composed:

Synchronize mind and body in the search for being:
feeling the whole body from within as a single field of energy, focus all attention on the source of thought "I."

Mind and body together, go ever deeper within yourself, become one with the "I" thought,
become one with the feeling of the inner body.

At a certain point, Aya had immersed herself so deeply in presence that she became pure presence herself. Silence now enveloped her completely, and she was filled with the joy of returning to the place of her heart, the infinite refuge of her being. She clearly felt that she was light, and allowed her field of energy to expand, making it perceptible to other beings. She distinctly saw circles of white light around her and felt certain that she was love, that she belonged to the one universal consciousness.

What many starseeds had forgotten, at the moment they incarnated on Earth, was that there existed a single infinite consciousness, which permeated every form of life, manifesting from the formless into form. It was a force of love that embraced everything and united every aspect into a single whole. All living beings were part of this universal consciousness, which continuously expanded and contracted in order to experience itself through every individual being.

In the common and limited experience, the mind created words to assign a comprehensible identity, to make people feel real and believe in the story each one had manifested. In truth, however, there existed only one consciousness, the creative essence of everything. Every human being was a different expression of this single source. The Higher Self of every sentient being was God; every cell of the body, every fiber of the sentient being was God. The energy field, the aura, the chakras, the blood, the bones — all were expressions of the Living One. The sacred essence of everything was the One manifesting as the different people and through them, in connection with others.

Awakening went far beyond the simple awareness that the contraction of consciousness into a single identity was temporary, or that one's "personal story" was impermanent. To awaken meant to know with absolute certainty that one was part of the One, even if, in one's limited understanding, each person momentarily believed that their focused identity was their true essence.

There was no ego. "Ego" was just a word invented to describe the contraction of consciousness into a focused identity with which almost everyone identified. Just as consciousness expanded, it could contract, allowing the universal frequencies to manifest in a concrete form.

At the moment of the Shift, all those who were ready would gain access to expanded consciousness, directly experiencing the infinite life force. In that state, the focused identity — the personal story — would dissolve, perceived as non-local and immersed in the infinite awareness of the totality of existence.

Aya, after an indefinite time spent in the blissful and undifferentiated light of the one impersonal consciousness, emerged from meditation. It was not accurate to say that she had been the one to interrupt the session: the samadhi, which had as its object the unitary perception of her whole body from within and simultaneously the attention on the thought "I", dissolved spontaneously. In Aya, although an intelligence was still present, there no longer existed any individual will; things simply happened in perfect harmony, following the universal law that governed every manifestation: the law of impersonal consciousness. It was the same law that moved the planets, that decided the exact moment when ripe fruits fell from trees, that determined when and if a seed should sprout, and that regulated the infinite movement of the waves of the sea. Aya herself, in a certain sense, was that law: a wave that had finally realized it was the ocean.

Before going down to the kitchen for breakfast, Aya opened the window of her room. The morning light flooded the room, filling her eyes. Aya deeply loved the light, because outwardly it perfectly represented the inner light of her consciousness. Light allowed forms to manifest, gave life to what was latent and not yet expressed, and supported every creature equally, without any distinction. Aya leaned out; a light breeze caressed her face, and her gaze naturally settled on the ancient olive tree in the garden. Since she had recognized her divine nature, Aya perceived the same essence in every living creature. Some beings, however, reflected more intensely the impersonal light of the one consciousness: trees, flowers, and children were among them. Aya could deeply feel the soul of that olive tree, perceiving within it the same peace and the same silence that dwelled deep within her.

From the intensity of the morning light, Aya sensed that it was just a few minutes before seven. Soon she would go down for breakfast, after which she and her son Kabamur would leave by car to meet a stranger who claimed to have found one of those precious and mysterious high-frequency crystals destined to activate during the Shift. While she was forming these thoughts, Aya suddenly perceived within herself a hand of shadow, with long claws, trying to grasp her heart. Despite the terrifying sensation and inner vision, Aya maintained the perfect attitude of the pure witness. Every thought, every emotion, and every image were observed by Aya without any reaction: this was the secret of meditation, not to control and not to react. When it was clearly understood that every phenomenon was only a manifestation of consciousness, no attachment arose, and every experience was freely allowed to manifest. If, while observing something pleasant, desire arose, Aya remained still and neutral, allowing the energy to flow. In the same way, if upon perceiving something unpleasant aversion arose, Aya maintained the same impassibility of the witness, letting everything happen.

Aya did not react in the slightest to the disturbing vision and simply allowed it to expand. In a flash, she clearly saw the supposed shaman, a bald man with a long and unkempt beard, as he hurled a jet of energy in the direction of her son Kabamur. Without being disturbed by it, Aya made her way toward the stairs leading to the kitchen, her stomach slightly growling — it was, in fact, her habit to skip dinner.

CHAPTER 2

Kabamur sat with his back straight, legs crossed, and eyes gently closed. His consciousness was immersed in darkness. The only perception, beyond the warm darkness that enveloped him, was the rhythm of his breath. When he inhaled, he felt his entire body from within as a single field of energy; when he exhaled, he gently let go of that sensation, finding himself in absolute emptiness.

Sometimes, in the deep silence, a fleeting thought would surface in his consciousness. Kabamur would then observe it without identifying with it, mentally labeling it: "Thinking." In doing so, he would naturally bring his attention back to the breath. And the cycle would begin again: an exhalation, and Kabamur would dissolve with it; the breath would vanish, and with it, the sensation of his being. Then, spontaneously, a new inhalation would arrive, and Kabamur, effortlessly, would return to his posture, to the unitary feeling of his body.

He had been meditating in that state of deep stillness for three hours. Beyond the simple observation of the breath, Kabamur was aware of the meditator himself, of the one who was breathing, of the subtle and unchanging consciousness that perceived everything — the "I AM" of the ancient scriptures, present in all sacred traditions. The feeling of being a silent witness was of an indescribable bliss, perhaps the most authentic and profound happiness possible on Earth.

However, suddenly, the stillness was interrupted by the soft sound of the timer set on his iPhone: the time had come, though reluctantly, to let go of that wonderful state and return to everyday reality, to the work that awaited him.

It was not easy to describe Kabamur's work without making a few clarifications. In practice, Kabamur managed an X page — formerly Twitter — followed by thousands and thousands of users, where he shared messages received telepathically from his mother, Aya. These messages came from beings of light called Pleiadians, inhabitants of the Pleiades.

According to these messages, Earth was close to an epochal shift: when Elder Ikai, commander of the Galactic Federation and father of his Higher Self, gave the command, the inhabitants of Earth with a pure heart would ascend to a more evolved parallel world. This new world, called Sheen, would be free from the evil influences that characterized earthly reality.

For millennia, the forces of the Galactic Federation had tried to raise the vibrations of human beings by incarnating as such and teaching peace, enlightenment, truth, and love. The long-awaited moment had finally arrived, in which a portion of Earth's inhabitants would leave their physical bodies to assume a form of pure light. This moment had been prophesied by numerous messengers, including Jesus Christ himself, when he spoke in the scriptures of a "new heaven" or of the fact that "your whole body shall be full of light."

Before the ascension, evil, destruction, and duality on Earth would reach their peak, in the sense of a total separation, since only a part of humanity would have access to the new evolved dimension, while the other half would remain in the current reality, destined to become increasingly dark until its inevitable destruction.

To support this critical transition and counter the influence of evil, numerous beings of light from higher dimensions, known as starseeds, had decided to incarnate, in these dark times, on Earth as humans. The problem was that, at the moment of conception, when the soul entered the mother's womb, memories were erased, causing the starseeds to forget their true origin. Kabamur's task, in addition to spreading the telepathic messages received from his mother Aya, was to clarify doubts and support the awakening of the souls of the starseeds. These, through downloads of information sent to their unconscious, gradually began to remember and to reactivate the connection with their own Higher Self.

Kabamur was rather worried. It wouldn't be correct to say that he was worried, because Kabamur had long since learned to disidentify from his own thoughts and emotions. He now knew with certainty — having experienced it directly — that he was the silent observer, the witness of all the thoughts and emotions that surfaced in his consciousness.

To learn to disidentify from his own "Ego" — that tangle of thoughts built around the fundamental thought of "I" — Kabamur had learned to observe thoughts and emotions in a detached way: without judging them, without classifying them, without labeling them as good or bad, and above all without attributing any identity to the thoughts. He had understood that it was not possible to go beyond the Ego by fighting it or opposing it, as that would only generate more resistance. The only way to transcend the Ego was to observe it without judgment, without trying to change it, modify it, or suppress it. It was enough to let the thoughts be, knowing that he was the presence, the empty and conscious space in which those thoughts manifested. Kabamur knew with certainty that he was not "the thinker," not the voice inside the head, not that tangle of thoughts; he was the observer, the silent witness, always beyond all of that.

Thus, Kabamur was not worried in the usual sense, but could observe apparently worrying thoughts arising in the emptiness of his consciousness. Trump had won the elections. The Pleiadians had announced it long before to his mother, and now Biden had been removed. For years Kabamur had been warning his followers that Biden, as well as many celebrities and public figures, were in fact Clones: beings genetically identical to the originals, artificially created in laboratories but without a soul. It was through cloning that the Cabal — a secret and evil organization led by Larry Page, the founder of Google — had managed to deceive humanity and maintain control.

Putin, Xi Jinping, Biden: all artificial automatons created in laboratories and remotely controlled. The only one among the great leaders whom the dark forces had not managed to recruit or clone was precisely Trump, whose Higher Self was the Archangel Uriel.

Among the various "alien" races incarnated on Earth, some were much older than others. Some came directly from the Elohim origin — the dimension of the Absolute without time or space — and were able to fully manifest their divine identity. The archangels belonged to this category: eternal beings, always safe from malignant astral attacks.

Kabamur was sincerely happy that Trump had won the latest elections, and yet he also felt a sense of concern. This concern arose from the fact that, according to the messages received telepathically from the Pleiadians through his mother, before the Shift — the ascension to the new Earth, Sheen — the darkness on Earth would become more and more intense, until it almost generated a physical split in the fabric of reality.

Kabamur got up from his meditation cushion and headed downstairs toward the kitchen. As he stood up and walked down the stairs, his attention remained always turned inward, inside his body. With each step, Kabamur felt his whole body from within, with awareness spread throughout every part of it. Keeping part of his attention constantly inside his body, without assigning it a precise form, automatically slowed the flow of thoughts, allowing Kabamur to remain always anchored in the present moment. While, with bodily awareness, he practiced this exercise, Kabamur's mental attention was directed toward self-awareness, the thought "I," the meditator, the walker — in short, the subject! This subject, this elusive "I," at times would disappear, absorbed by the attention itself, and Kabamur, as he brought his attention deeply within himself, could feel a blissful stillness, an unchanging silence, an inexhaustible source of peace.

Arriving in the kitchen, Kabamur looked up at the clock: it read 6:30. Soon, around 7, his mother would come down as well, she too engaged in her daily meditation. Kabamur then began preparing breakfast for both: green tea with ginger and lemon, and crispbread covered with honey. As he lit the burner and placed the small pot of water on the stove, he felt a ripple in his consciousness: haste. Since his attention was always turned inward, observing thoughts and emotions, nothing could escape his inner radar.

That morning, in fact, around 10 a.m., he and his mother had to go to an appointment with a supposed shaman, who claimed to have found one of the quartz crystals placed by the Galactic Federation in preparation for the Shift.

Kabamur and Aya were in Sedona, Arizona, a place famous for the energy vortices that could be felt in the chakras when standing on certain points of the ground. This phenomenon was due to the fact that, thousands of years earlier, the Galactic Federation had placed huge Rock Crystal Pyramids beneath the soil, programmed to activate during the Shift. The Crystals, together with the 144,000 light workers—starseeds incarnated on Earth, who, despite the temptations of darkness, would always choose the light—would, at the moment when Elder Ikai, the commander of the Galactic Federation, gave the signal, create a luminous network of very high frequency.

Immediately the light would enter the bodies of the pure of heart and, in an instant, about half of humanity would be catapulted into a new dimension, onto a new Earth, with a body made of pure light.
Kabamur took a deep breath, reconnecting with the unified feeling of his body. His awareness expanded once again throughout his physical form, allowing him to feel his hands, arms, feet, legs, torso, and head as a single field of energy. The rush completely dissolved.
He had just finished preparing the rusks with honey when Aya entered the room. Every time he looked at his mother, Kabamur felt an intense love and a deep calm. His thoughts, already rare and well-managed, dissipated even more, and the ever-present sense of peace within him grew stronger.
They looked into each other's eyes: words were superfluous compared to the true communication made of silence, light, and love. They ate without speaking until Aya gently broke the silence:
"During meditation I had a vision. The shaman we are supposed to meet is a fraud. He will set a trap for us."
"So..." Kabamur replied, "we're not going?"
"So," Aya clarified firmly, "we go prepared. I want to find out if he works for the Cabal and what his true intentions are!"

CHAPTER 3

Kabamur and Aya arrived at the meeting place about thirty minutes early. They were in a sort of desolate clearing, where the only sign of life was a patch of shrubs a few hundred meters away. The sun, although not yet at its zenith, was beating down hard on their heads.

After just a few minutes of being there, Kabamur was struck by a sudden and powerful headache. There was something strange about that place. Aya didn't seem to be at her best either. At one point, she exclaimed:

"My son, I feel evil energies inhabiting this place. Also, I sense that black magic has been practiced here. Let's stay ready! Kabamur, prepare to use the forces of the elements. This shaman might be a walk-in."

For a moment Kabamur was paralyzed, a shiver ran down his spine. Immediately, he increased his inner presence, focusing on the "I Am" and directing his attention to the feeling of his own presence. As soon as he regained control, he found himself in contact with his inner body—the perception of his entire body from within, the fundamental vibration of his being.

His mother's words echoed in his mind: prepare to use the forces of the elements. So Kabamur began to invoke those energies within himself.

In Yoga, there were two main paths to awaken the divine force present in every human being – the kundalini: through the chakras or through the elements. When working with the chakras, attention and imagination were focused on specific points of the body, the so-called psychic centers; with the elements, instead, attention expanded to entire regions of the body, perceived from within. The chakras could be imagined as power plants that supplied energy to specific areas of the body. By working on those specific areas, one could trace the energy back to the power plants.

Thus, by working with the elements, the chakras would open and the kundalini would awaken; and vice versa, through the chakras, the elements would be activated. It was a common belief that work on the elements was preliminary to that on the chakras, but in truth, the Yoga of the elements was a system in its own right, considered by some to be the most powerful of all.

Kabamur sat down, closed his eyes, and inhaled slowly, allowing the mind to settle, and began to invoke the five elements, also known as tattwa: earth, water, fire, air, and ether.

First, he summoned the earth element. In his mind, a wide and heavy square of bright yellow light took shape, a symbol of stability. He envisioned it clearly, positioned between his knees and feet. He mentally traced the four sides, sensing the solidity of the yellow square, its dense and weighty texture. Then he began to repeat, inwardly, the associated mantra: LAM, LAM, LAM. Each vibration seemed to come directly from the square, as if shape and sound were one and the same.

When the perception of the square was steady, he moved on to the water element. He saw a crescent moon appear—luminous and bright white in color—suspended between his knees and his navel. He traced its outline with his mind, sensing at the same time the fluidity and freshness of the water element. And once again, he repeated the mantra: VAM, VAM, VAM. Each sound seemed to flow from the moon itself, like a liquid and living reflection.

Then, slowly, Kabamur gave space to the fire element. Before his inner eyes appeared a triangle of red light, with its apex pointing downward, superimposed over the navel, the other two points at the level of the heart. Heat grew within him as he perceived the bright red. He immersed himself in that energy and mentally pronounced: RAM, RAM, RAM. Each vibration seemed to spring directly from the triangle, filling the chest region with red, living light.

Kabamur now summoned the air element. He visualized a sky-blue hexagon, formed by six points of light joined together, a symbol of movement and freedom. It was located between the heart and the center of the eyebrows. He felt the air vibrate and flow, and began to repeat: YAM, YAM, YAM. The vibration was light, like the wind dancing through space.

Finally, Kabamur summoned the ether element—pure energy, the space in which matter becomes manifest. At the crown of the head, from the center of the eyebrows extending beyond the top of the skull, he imagined a black circle, the same size as the hexagon, filled with a myriad of multicolored points. Within the circle, he could perceive absolute emptiness, and he repeated: HAM, HAM, HAM. It was the call of pure space, where all things take form.

Kabamur clearly remembered Aya's instructions: each symbol—the yantra—was not just something to be seen, but to be felt from within the body, as if the body itself were the space in which the form appeared.

Then he brought together all the previous visualizations. He saw himself becoming the consciousness in which the images appeared. Within him, the five elements manifested all at once—the lower, heavier vibrations like earth below, and the higher, lighter ones like ether above—suspended in silence. In that moment, he uttered the primordial sound: OM. The vibration enveloped every form, every color, until they dissolved into absolute stillness.

Aya had explained the meaning of this practice to him many times. While a mandala was the pictorial representation of an inner vision, a yantra was its mathematical and abstract representation. The final image, in which all the elements were present, was the mandala composed of the various yantras. When one meditated on a mandala or a yantra, the subconscious mind connected to what the symbol represented, because the symbol itself had been discovered by the ancient yogis who meditated incessantly on the elements.

Moreover, just as every thought possessed an image or a form, so too did every image or form have a nada—a sound, a corresponding vibration. Thus, while the yantra was the pure form of the element—as God Himself had conceived it in the beginning—the sound, the mantra, was the decoding of the element on the level of vibration or sound—as God Himself had named it in the beginning. And in truth, the sound and the image were the same thing, only expressed in different ways.

He took a long breath — it was time. He was finally ready for battle. Besides having activated the elements within himself, he also drew a gun, a Glock 19, from his pocket. His mother had told him to show up prepared for the meeting, and there was no point in forgoing conventional weapons.

Thanks to the meditation on the elements, the slight headache had completely passed. However, his mother did not seem to be at her best. She looked suffering, as if she were sustaining an intense physical effort.

“Mama, what’s happening to you?”

“Kabamur, my son. I am absorbing the negative energy field present in this place. Look over there,” she said, pointing to a spot about ten meters from them. “A powerful and evil black magic has been practiced here. The shaman who brought us here, even though we cannot yet see him, is a walk-in of Oppisheklio. I clearly recognize his essence.”

At her words, a shiver ran down Kabamur’s spine. At the spot Aya had indicated there was a boulder covered in a red substance—almost certainly blood. From it branched out several lines that connected to other boulders, also stained with the same substance. Kabamur hadn't noticed it at first, probably because of a spell of obscuration.

The shiver that had run through him, however, was not due to the fact that they were standing on a negative energy grid, but rather to the information he had received about the walk-in's identity. Now that his mother had pointed it out, he too could sense the dark presence of Oppisheklio.

He had long studied Oppisheklio and his influence on the history of humanity. He was known in countless cultures under different names: Enki, Apollo, Set, Typhon, Abaddon, Helios, Mithra, Adonai, Prometheus, Zarathustra, Yaldabaoth… and many others. But in every mask, in every era, the intent had always been the same: to confuse, to divide, and to be worshipped as a false light. The Pleiadians called him the greatest deceiver the Earth had ever known—the serpent in the Garden of Eden, the bringer of knowledge in exchange for separation.

Kabamur also knew the older story, the one no human book could tell. Oppisheklio and Ashtar were brothers, sons of Ketaweh, a Sirian from the star Nopplia, and of Pidkozox, a reptilian from Uranus. Unlike many other Sirians created in Elohim, they had been born. And, like all beings who are born, they possessed full free will.

Ashtar chose the light. Oppisheklio did not. When their father began to rebel against the Galactic Federation, he pushed his younger son even deeper into the darkness. Together they tried to replace the galactic light with a distorted version, based on control, fear, and sacrifice. This was the false light that Oppisheklio would later bring to Earth in countless forms.

He was worshiped in the occult rituals of cultural elites, while institutional religions often carried, often unknowingly, the symbolism of his figure. Thus he was transformed into the solar creator—a light imposed from above, artificial, dominating the collective consciousness without ever truly illuminating it.

The truth, however, was quite different. Kabamur knew that humanity had been genetically uplifted by the Galactic Federation long before the biblical accounts. When human beings were nothing more than primates able to walk upright, the Federation had discovered Earth and begun a slow and loving process of assistance. The souls of its members began to incarnate in earthly bodies.

Even though each soul, at the moment of conception, forgot its own origin, the higher consciousness remained intact, present as a vibration. It took very little: an intuition, an evolutionary impulse, a choice. One of those souls could, for example, imprint in the host body-mind the new idea of cooking meat before eating it. That idea, born from within, would be experimented with and, over time, would alter genetic expression, acting directly on DNA. Consciousness transformed matter.

In addition to this, there were also direct interventions. The building of the pyramids, the alignment of Earth's energy grids, advanced astronomical knowledge — all of this had been given by the Federation.

Oppisheklio, on the other hand, had created nothing. He had simply manipulated an already existing genetic line during the Atlantean era, selecting a dominant lineage: tall beings, with elongated heads, and extraordinarily long lives. From that lineage came the first pharaohs and, in more recent times, also figures like Jesus and other beings of light incarnated with the sole purpose of countering that genetics in whose code evil was hidden.

But Kabamur knew that no genetic line could determine the essence of a soul. The soul was always free, beyond biology.

Beyond physical incarnation, Oppisheklio also manifested in another way: as a walk-in. Kabamur reflected deeply on that concept. A walk-in was a soul that entered a physical body already inhabited, taking the place of the previous soul. Sometimes this passage occurred with mutual consent, in a sacred act of cooperation. Some walk-ins were beings of light, come to help the Earth in critical times.

But Oppisheklio was not one of them. His entries into human bodies were forced, violent, occurring through dark rituals, and his arrival destroyed the energetic balance of the host being.
Kabamur knew of his past possessions. During the Roman Empire, he had taken the body of Emperor Constantine, using the new Christian religion to mask an ancient solar cult. In more recent times, he had entered the body of Joseph Stalin after a blood ritual, leading the Soviet Union through a regime of terror and destruction.
He also knew that Oppisheklio had never been entirely alone. Some among the current human elites still embodied his bloodline or were possessed by entities connected to him. Larry Page was possessed by Oppisheklio's son, while Hillary Clinton, before being replaced by a clone, carried within her the soul of his daughter, Zephorek Meindas.
And yet, despite all this, Kabamur felt no fear. That reality, however dark, was clear. It did not confuse him. It did not disturb him. He knew it deeply, and for that reason it could no longer dominate him.
He knew that the soul could not be possessed, and that the light, even if covered by centuries of falsehood, was destined to prevail. Nothing could stop what was coming.
The Shift was near.
All those thoughts passed through Kabamur's consciousness in a single instant. They were deep reflections, yet familiar: after all, they were his daily bread. He spoke of them every day on his X page, trying to awaken sleeping souls and bring them back to their true stellar origin. However, in that moment, there was no time for teaching. There was only presence, action, vigilance.

Although he had been a silent witness to those inner reflections, his posture remained alert. The Glock was firm in his right hand, while his eyes moved quickly, from right to left, scanning the environment. The presence of Oppisheklio had become stronger than ever: the vibratory field seemed to tremble in every particle of air around them. And yet, the physical figure hosting that dark soul had not yet appeared.

Then everything happened in an instant.

Out of nowhere, the shaman materialized just a few meters from where Kabamur and Aya were standing. His hands, open as if caressing an invisible sphere, rose in front of his chest. Without uttering a single word, a stream of dark energy suddenly burst from his palms, aimed straight at them.

Kabamur didn't hesitate. His left hand moved instinctively forward, while his right still gripped the gun. From the center of his palm, a powerful red stream—pure fire—was released, colliding head-on with the shaman's dark energy. The two opposing forces clashed midair, generating a silent blast and a sharp vibration, as if the air itself were screaming.

The shaman grimaced in frustration. Kabamur seized the moment: he raised the Glock, aimed it directly at the opponent's chest, and pulled the trigger. But at the very instant he did so, the impact between the two energies caused him to stagger. The shot, instead of hitting the heart, struck the shaman in the left shoulder, sending him reeling backward.

Kabamur remained still for a moment. There was no anger in his heart, no hatred. Not even contempt. He knew the shaman was nothing more than a body-mind possessed by a dark entity. The original soul of that man had long since been pushed out. If he killed him, he wouldn't be destroying a living being, but simply freeing a corrupted vessel.

He wouldn't have hesitated to do it again, if necessary. But there was no need.

With a guttural hiss, the shaman turned and threw himself into the vegetation, fleeing with unnatural speed. He left behind a crackling energetic trail and a faint line of blood dripping from his wounded shoulder. Kabamur was about to chase him, but something stopped him.

A sound. A dull thud. He turned around. Aya was on the ground.

Her body lay stretched between two rocks, motionless, her face pale, her hands still trembling. Kabamur ran to her, heart pounding in his throat. As he approached, he saw clearly the reason for her fall: near her ankle, a small swollen puncture wound, with a purplish halo slowly spreading across the skin. Just a bit farther, hidden among dust and dry leaves, slithered a snake with a dark, glossy body, bronze reflections on its skin, and a yellow stripe running along its sides. Its eyes, black as night, seemed to absorb the surrounding light. It moved with spectral grace — silent, lethal. And most of all… out of place.

It was not a creature of the desert. It did not belong to the fauna of Sedona. It was not a rattlesnake, nor a species that should have been there.

Kabamur knew it. Not because he had studied it in some biology book, but because his intuition struck him like a revelation.

The bite had not been an accident. Kabamur understood it with absolute clarity: all of this had been planned. The black magic that Aya was absorbing, the energy battle, the shaman's appearance… it had all been a diversion. A distraction. The real attack had been meant for her. And now her life was in danger.

Kabamur knelt beside his mother. He placed his hand on her chest and, by feeling his whole body from within as a single sensation, tried to connect to the energy field generated by his mother's body. Once the connection was established, he directed toward Aya as much vital energy as possible, although much of it had already been consumed in invoking the elements. Fortunately, he could still feel his mother's breath—labored but present. Her light was intact, but flickering. He had to act immediately.

CHAPTER 4

Kabamur was in the car.
As he drove the Toyota RAV4 like a rally driver, his brain was working at incredible speed. From absolute stillness, streams of thoughts poured into his awareness. Kabamur was present in every cell of his body, fully anchored in the unified feeling of his whole body from within, and in the stillness, the peace that existed deep within that sensation. It seemed to him that reasoning emerged spontaneously from silence itself. In that inner space, both were present: silence and thoughts, like when one listens to the song of a bird or the sound of a car and realizes that both are born and die within silence.
The more one managed to stay in contact with that silence at the depth of the inner body — which was simultaneously the feeling of the space occupied by one's body and the source of the "I thought" — the more thought aligned with that of one's higher self, the soul that was God. Not only that: in that state, an intuition could emerge, telepathically dictated by the spirit guide.
Kabamur knew that no starseed was ever truly alone on the earthly path. From the very moment of entering the mother's womb, every soul was accompanied by a guide, chosen in love from the beginning. A friendly consciousness, often a relative, coming from the higher realms: a companion soul that had decided to stay close, invisible but present, to whisper in the silence of the mind forgotten memories, intuitions, dreams, and warnings.
Everyone had one. Or more than one. Some guides changed over time, others remained for the entire duration of the earthly dream. Kabamur also knew he had played that role many times before incarnating. He knew that the connection between guide and incarnated being transcended time, distance, and even death. It was a sacred exchange, pure, free of judgment, beyond the ego.

He found himself thinking of Jesus. Yeshua. Not as the religious texts told it, but as he truly knew him: an avatar of light, a Pleiadian from Merope incarnated under the name of Sananda. Kabamur felt the truth vibrating in his consciousness: Elder Ikai, the great spiritual leader of Taygeta — and his father in the higher realms — had been Sananda's guide during his mission on Earth.

While the world accused him of being crazy for hearing an "inner voice," Yeshua walked guided by the calm and silent wisdom of Ikai. It was not "God" speaking to him, not in the way the priests of the time understood it: not an anthropomorphic being seated on a heavenly throne, but an elevated consciousness, a galactic brother, a companion of origin.

Yeshua did not come to found a religion. He never asked to be worshiped. He taught that God is within us, that we are all children of the Source, and that miracles were not exclusive but simply the natural expression of awakened consciousness. He did not speak of a God who punishes, but of an Intelligence of Love that dwells in every creature. He said that anyone could do the things he did—even greater ones.

He was betrayed. Manipulated in the accounts. His name, his message, his image were rewritten, bent, transformed to fit the powers of the time. But his true essence remained intact. Kabamur felt it. He saw it in the dreams of those who were awakening, in the forgotten words resurfacing from ancient texts, and in the hearts that were beginning to remember.

Jesus — or rather, Sananda — did not die on the cross. Kabamur knew it. He had left the Earth in light, together with Nashea, the Pleiadian the world knew as Mary Magdalene. They had loved each other deeply. They had had children. Together they had taught the power of union, the strength of forgiveness, the beauty of compassion.

And now... Sananda had returned. Incarnated again to accompany humanity through the Shift.
Kabamur knew he would meet him. Not as a god to be worshiped, but as a brother of light. Because the teaching had never been about the Messenger, but about the Message.
And the message was clear: God is inside you. You are light. You are love. And you are here to remember it.
And then, as Kabamur reflected on spirit guides, Jesus Christ, and drove the Toyota along the dirt and gravel roads toward the city, a thought struck him like lightning. He almost veered off the road, so intense was the intuitive surge:
"The snake that had bitten his mother was not from those parts."
And perhaps it wasn't precisely because — in that hospital — the antivenom wouldn't be there.
Oppisheklio had planned everything. He wanted Kabamur to take Aya to the hospital, only for him to discover that they didn't have the antivenom there, making him lose precious time.
Kabamur understood clearly: he had to take his mother to a healer. There was no other way.
No sooner had the idea of a healer arisen in Kabamur's mind than the image of Peter Cutler surfaced from his consciousness.
Peter was a former Zen monk who had reached the highest degree of awakening: the complete dissolution of the ego in the light of the Source. He was the only one who could help him — and fortunately, he lived not far from where they were.
Kabamur pressed his foot harder on the accelerator, while glancing from time to time to make sure his mother, seated beside him in the passenger seat, was still breathing. He could feel her energy growing weaker and weaker.

He finally arrived at Peter's house, and to his great relief saw him already standing in the driveway, next to another figure he couldn't identify at first. He parked in the lot in front of the house, and the two men automatically approached.

"Peter!" Kabamur shouted as soon as he set foot on the ground. "My mother is…"

"I know," Peter interrupted him calmly. "I sensed it mentally. And for once, chance is on our side — here with me is also Teja Anand, a healer."

Kabamur was struck by a rush of rapid thoughts. He knew Peter personally — they had been friends for some time — but he had never met Teja; he only knew him by name. He did know, however, that Teja was a spiritual teacher known on Quora for his sharp sincerity and direct approach to the deepest questions.

While Peter often spoke of a gradual path toward awakening, Teja proposed the absence of any path at all — an instantaneous awakening, Zen-style.

Kabamur was aware that the debate between gradual and sudden awakening ran through the history of all spiritual traditions… and he knew that, paradoxically, both were true.

But what truly struck him was the synchronicity of the moment. It couldn't be a coincidence that Teja was there with Peter on that very day. The same voice that had warned Peter of the danger approaching must have been the one that moved Teja to be there.

Kabamur reflected on how interventions from the Higher Realms took place. On the one hand, there was always an effort to respect the free will of human beings and starseeds, so that difficulties could become opportunities for spiritual growth. But at times, decisive actions were taken.

Thousands of nuclear warheads had failed to detonate thanks to the silent intervention of the Galactic Federation. Thousands of disasters had been prevented without anyone ever knowing.
And — no less — in the last assassination attempt on Donald Trump, the earthly manifestation of Archangel Uriel, a bullet had been mysteriously deflected, missing him by mere millimeters. The media had spoken of a "weapon malfunction," but Kabamur was certain: it had been a direct intervention.
Teja, who had probably picked up the entire mental flow of Kabamur, spoke in a calm but authoritative voice:
"This is not the time to think about the dilemma between free will and destiny. They are both just fictions within the dream. We must help your mother."
Kabamur nodded. Teja was right.
With the help of Peter and Teja, they gently lifted Aya and carried her inside the house. The living room already seemed prepared: a mattress was laid out on the floor, plenty of cushions, a neatly folded wool blanket, the windows slightly ajar. The atmosphere was quiet, as if the house itself knew what was about to happen.
They laid Aya down on the mattress, in a supine position. Peter exclaimed:
"Now we will perform a healing ritual in Yoga Nidra. I will read the text. Kabamur, and Teja, you will place your hands on Aya's body. In this way we will achieve the maximum effect. If Aya manages to enter a deep Samadhi, the Light of the Source will be able to heal her spontaneously."
Kabamur sat to Aya's left, Teja to her right. Both placed their hands on her body — over the heart, the abdomen, and the head.

Aya lay still. Her face was pale, yet relaxed. Her breath was faint. And yet, something within her had already begun to respond, as if a deep part of her were resurfacing.

Peter, seated in front of them, closed his eyes for a moment. Then he began to speak in a slow, rhythmic, enveloping voice:

"Aya, be aware that you are about to begin the practice of YOGA NIDRA. No concentration or mental effort is required. The only important thing is to maintain a constant flow of awareness from beginning to end. And for this, you may set the intention to remain awake and alert for the entire duration of the YOGA NIDRA practice.

Repeat to yourself: "I will remain awake for the entire duration of the YOGA NIDRA practice."

Now bring all your attention into your feet; feel them from within as a single field of energy; perceive the space occupied by your feet, the vital energy present within them.

Now shift your attention to the space occupied by your legs: from the ankles up to the groin. Feel your legs from within, as a single sensation. Bring all your attention, all your awareness, into your legs.

Now move your attention to the lower part of the torso — the abdomen, hips, and belly. Feel this entire part of the body from within; flood the space occupied by the lower torso with awareness.

Now move your attention higher, to the upper part of the torso. Feel the whole chest from within, as a single field of energy. Let your attention penetrate deeply into this perception — the perception of the space occupied by your chest.

Now go to the hands. Feel the space occupied by your hands; become aware of the subtle sensation of vitality within them. Feel from within each of the fingers distinctly, your awareness diffused throughout the entire space occupied by your hands.

Now it is time for the arms. Feel both of your arms, from the wrists to the shoulders, from within. Your awareness is spread throughout the entire space occupied by the arms.
Now feel the vital energy contained within the head. Feel the whole head from within as a single field of energy.
Now let your attention travel through the body like a wave, three times, from the feet to the head and back again. Let awareness enter the toes of both feet, and slowly, while feeling the body from within, let it flow upward—through the ankles, calves, knees, thighs. In the pelvis, let the awareness of both legs join together, and begin also to feel the fingers of the hands, moving upward, sensing attention flowing inside the hands and the groin, rising upward. At the level of the shoulders, the awareness of hands and torso merges and ascends to the crown of the head.
Now feel the whole body from within in its totality, as a single field of energy. Become intensely present in every cell of your body.
Now that the feeling of the whole body from within has stabilized, now that your attention is spread simultaneously inside every part of your body as a single feeling, bring your attention even deeper into this feeling. Become one with it. Merge with the energy field of your body so that there is no longer duality between observer and observed, between you and your body.
Now you are completely immersed in the ocean of spirit; there is no longer any separation—there is only this awareness, this silence, which you yourself are."
Peter pronounced each word slowly, articulating it with gentleness.
As he spoke, Kabamur — and apparently Teja as well — tried to connect energetically to Aya's body, keeping their minds as free from thoughts as possible. By feeling his own body as a single sensation, Kabamur sought to include within that same sensation the perception of Aya's body, similar to what was done in Reiki.

In this way, the vital energy of the universe — the Prana — could flow spontaneously.
And indeed, as Peter spoke, Kabamur began to clearly feel the energetic flow: a subtle current descending from the crown of his head, passing through the chest and arms, and flowing out from the centers of his palms, directing itself straight into his mother's body.
The healing practice lasted about two hours. Once Peter had finished speaking, he too joined Kabamur and Teja, and all three simply remained with their hands on Aya's body, the prana flowing through them. When the practice was complete, they let Aya rest in silence and withdrew to the kitchen.
Kabamur felt exhausted, but within that exhaustion there was also a strange peace.

CHAPTER 5

Kabamur, Peter, and Teja were in the kitchen. Aya was still lying in the living room, asleep. Peter had advised not to disturb her, to let her rest as long as she needed.

In the meantime, Peter was preparing a dish of rice for himself, Teja, and Kabamur. It was almost four in the afternoon, and none of them had eaten lunch yet. Despite the circumstances, it was pleasant to be in the company of Peter and Teja: from both of them he felt the same sense of peace and well-being that he sensed coming from his mother, as if a light filled with love were emanating from their bodies.

Kabamur too, when he was in deep meditation, with body and mind absorbed in the feeling of the "I," often felt the same sensation; and even at that moment, in the background of his inner body — deep within the perception of his form — there were the same light, the same silence, and the same peace. And joining his own light with that of Teja and Peter, or with Aya's, simply amplified the joy and love already present within himself.

"So, Kabamur," exclaimed Teja, "tell us what happened! Last night, while I was resting, I heard a voice telling me to go to Peter immediately. Fortunately, I was nearby, so I got in the car and came."

"I had a similar experience," said Peter. "While I was watering the plants in the garden, I clearly heard a voice telling me that Aya, your mother, was in danger and that she would come here seeking help!"

Kabamur thought it must have been Peter's and Teja's guides who had warned them, although he didn't know who their Higher Selves were. His mother might have known, but she had never told him, and he didn't possess the same gifts of clairvoyance.

He then recounted what had happened with the shaman. Naturally, both Peter and Teja knew well who Oppisheklio was, but they had never mentioned him in their teachings: they surely feared that such a name might divert their students from the main goal—enlightenment. And perhaps they also considered the notion of the Higher Self simply another story, and, like all stories, true only from a relative point of view.

Kabamur knew this well too: everything was relative, everything was true and false at the same time; only the Absolute—God, the Self—was real, and the very act of naming it partly stripped it of its reality. Even to say that all reality was God was still a half-truth. Reality was simply what it was… unnamable, indescribable, immutable, beyond true and false, right and wrong, life and death. Anything the mind thought to be true—including enlightenment and Nirvana—was false by definition.

When Kabamur finished recounting what had happened, Peter immediately asked:

"But why, if you knew the shaman was an impostor, did you go to the meeting anyway? It will be Elder Ikai himself, as you teach me, who will give the signal for the Shift. What does it matter if this shaman had information about the placement of the crystals?"

Kabamur reflected for a few moments. He was unsure whether to reveal the real reason that had led them to meet the shaman, even though they knew he was an impostor. It was true: the Shift was certain, and Elder Ikai would decide when to give the signal. However, there was also a further truth. The more people were ready to "surrender" their ego—their ideas, their preconceptions, their personal story—the more positively the Shift would affect them. It was the well-known saying of Jesus Christ: the last, the humblest, would be the first, the closest to God.

To prepare human beings properly to surrender their ego, a Lemurian crystal had been left near one of the main crystals that would assist in the Ascension—a crystal containing a sadhana, or spiritual practice, that would allow the willing to purify their hearts to the highest degree. Lemurian crystals were special clear quartz stones that, if carefully programmed, were capable of preserving precious information that would be transmitted to minds and hearts able to receive it. But extracting information from a Lemurian crystal was by no means simple. One had to have worked with crystals for a long time, hold them close to the heart, in contact with the skin, and begin to connect one's inner body with the crystal, seeking to enter into "attunement" with it.

As with everything concerning the Galactic Federation, information was always revealed only halfway. On one hand, Aya had received the message – through telepathic communication – that the Lemurian crystal was located near one of those that would be used for the Shift; on the other hand, the possibility of discovering exactly where it was had been left to their free will.

Exercising that very free will, Kabamur decided to reveal to Teja and Peter the information about the Lemurian crystal. After he finished his explanation, there was a long moment of silence. Then Peter said:

"I have no idea where this crystal might be, but if Oppisheklio tried to set a trap for you, perhaps – and I mean perhaps – he also knows about the crystal. But above all, he knows that you're looking for it! How does he have that information?"

That was a good point. How did Oppisheklio know that they were searching for one of the groups of crystals that would be activated at the Shift — and that perhaps contained the Lemurian one with the sadhana? The shaman, when he had contacted them, had said he had found a place where he felt the chakras of his body spinning at a higher speed than usual. Sedona was, in fact, famous for its energy vortices that could be felt in the body's chakras. Beneath these vortices were giant triangular quartz crystals that had been programmed by the Galactic Federation to activate at the time of the Shift. These had been placed around the planet by the Pleiadians thousands of years ago and would emerge from the ground, rotating from side to side, at the moment of the Shift.

While these thoughts were swirling through Kabamur's mind, Aya appeared at the kitchen doorway. Her face was still pale, and it was clear that she was struggling to walk. Without wasting time on courtesies, she simply exclaimed: "Peter, Teja, thank you so much for your help. But now Kabamur and I must leave immediately. Our house is burning. I saw it just now with the eye of the mind!"

CHAPTER 6

Immediately, Kabamur and Aya took their leave of Peter and Teja, thanking them hastily, and sped toward home in their RAV4. In the meantime, certain of Aya's vision, they also alerted the fire department.

It was a wise decision, because when mother and son arrived on the scene, the fire had already almost destroyed half of the house. It was only thanks to the firefighters' intervention, who arrived a few minutes later, that they managed to save what remained of their home.

Kabamur felt anger exploding inside him. First the vile trap, and now this. Immediately, he synchronized mind and body toward Pure Awareness. Concerning the mind, he focused on the source of the thought "I"; concerning the body, he focused on the inner feeling of his body as a single field of energy.

Normally, his attention was always anchored in Pure Awareness — a formless awareness. However, when particularly turbulent emotions or seemingly intrusive thoughts arose within the field of his perception, Kabamur would immediately and decisively direct his thoughts toward the awareness of the Self, while simultaneously returning the perception of the body to its formless dimension.

In this way, he always maintained control over his mind and his emotions — the latter being nothing more than clusters of thoughts expressed within the body.

The firefighters worked for more than two hours to put out the blaze. Kabamur watched them pour foam and water over the last hotspots, and he thought that, even though it was his house burning, that spectacle of destruction still held something fascinating. Watching the fire element devour walls and bricks reminded him of the experience of the inner fire: the latent power of kundalini energy which, when awakened with wisdom, ended up consuming the Ego present in human beings.

In reality, even though many yoga books claimed otherwise, the ultimate truth — as he understood it — was that the most effective way to activate that energy was through inquiry: the joint and focused effort of mind and body in remaining centered on the source of the thought "I," while at the same time staying present within one's own body.

Inquiry was not a meditation practice to be performed once in a while, but something to be carried with oneself in daily life — at every moment and in every place.

As these thoughts occupied the empty space of his awareness, Kabamur turned toward his mother. Aya was pale, and an expression of suffering could be read on her face. It was clear that she had not yet fully recovered from the effects of the snake's venom. It was obvious she needed rest.

It was late at night when the last flames were finally extinguished. Although he had initially feared the worst, Kabamur noted with relief that the damage to the house was less than expected. The supporting structure had held up quite well and, although about half of the home was now uninhabitable, the other half had suffered practically no damage.

From what he could see, it was a stroke of luck amid misfortune: his room and his mother's — located in the inner part of the house, overlooking their private garden — had remained untouched. In his room was the computer that contained all his work: programs, images, and content he used to spread information on the social platform X. Losing it would have been quite inconvenient.

Beyond the inner garden, there was also a small guesthouse where friends of his or his mother's sometimes stayed.

Although he couldn't make it out clearly from the street, it seemed to him that it had remained intact.
Now all that remained was to convince the fire chief to let them stay in the guesthouse.
Kabamur approached the fire chief, a sturdy man in his fifties, his face reddened by the heat and his hands still smeared with ash. He spoke to him in a respectful but determined tone:
"I know this may seem like a premature request, but it looks like the back part of the house hasn't been touched. Our rooms are there, and in my study there's a computer that contains all my work. A little further on, as you may have seen, there's a guesthouse that seems completely intact. I wanted to ask if we can retrieve that computer… and, if possible, stay temporarily in the guesthouse. We have nowhere else to go."
The fire chief observed him in silence for a few moments, his jaw clenched. His expression was unreadable — steady, almost stern. Then he said:
"I understand the situation, but I can't let you go in just like that, lightly. Even if some parts appear intact, there could be structural risks, toxic smoke, collapses… Safety comes first."
Kabamur pretended to nod, ready to insist, but the man unexpectedly raised a hand.
"That said… we can do this: I'll accompany you personally. But first, come with me to the station. You need to rest a bit, get checked, have something warm to drink. And I need some time to formally authorize your reentry — even a partial one."
He turned, pointing toward a fire truck waiting nearby with its headlights on.
"Get in. It'll only be a matter of an hour. Then, if everything goes well, I'll take you back to the guesthouse myself and let you retrieve what you need — but under my supervision."

Kabamur looked at his mother. Aya, still weakened, gave a faint nod. Then he turned back to the firefighter. He didn't know why, but he felt a kind of repulsion toward the man, even though he was simply doing his job. In fact, to be fair, he had even shown himself to be helpful.

"All right. We'll accept," he said, his tone a bit abrupt. Then he reconsidered and added, in a gentler voice, "Thank you, truly."

The fire chief gave a brief nod, his expression unchanged. "You're lucky. If the wind had been stronger, we wouldn't even be having this conversation."

Kabamur didn't reply. He silently followed his mother as they climbed into the back of the vehicle. The fire was over, but the echo of what had happened still burned within him.

CHAPTER 7

The stop at the fire station lasted longer than expected. Kabamur and Aya were offered food and drinks, along with a couple of hard wooden benches on which to sleep. Aya, exhausted, fell asleep immediately, and when the fire chief returned, she was still sleeping deeply, with an almost childlike expression on her face. Kabamur decided not to wake her. He would go alone with the fire chief to check the damage to the house. If everything was calm, he would come back to get her.

The fire chief, whom Kabamur had meanwhile learned was named George, had shown himself to be extraordinarily courteous – attentive, helpful, even caring. And yet, something still didn't feel right. George had a steady, vacant gaze, almost programmed. Not a cold look in the human sense of the word, but one that seemed to belong to nothing. No empathy, no subtle signals, not even the faintest flicker of hesitation. And yet, Kabamur didn't sense any negative presence coming from him. He told himself it was probably just exhaustion distorting his perception.

When they arrived home, it was already dawn. The gray morning light made everything look unreal, as if they had stepped into a faded photograph. George was the first to enter. He led the way with a calm, measured pace and began to inspect the interior. Kabamur followed him in silence, immediately noticing that the damage was less severe than he had feared. Some blackened walls, broken doors, a sharp, pungent smell — but the rooms in the back had remained untouched. Even his study seemed to be in order.

Then something strange happened. George bent down behind the living room bookshelf, which had partially come loose from the wall, pulled out a small black object, and held it between his fingers for a few seconds. He looked at it, then turned toward Kabamur with a different expression.

"You know, we don't usually find these in civilian homes," he said, lifting the microcamera between his thumb and forefinger. "Let me guess... you one of the mafia?"

Kabamur stared at him, momentarily disoriented. "What? No!"

But George's words had just triggered a memory. Like a bolt from the blue, everything became clear. That's how Oppisheklio, in the guise of the shaman, had known that Kabamur and Aya were searching for the Lemurian crystal! Two months earlier, there had been a major power outage in their neighborhood. Technicians had been sent to every home, as a precaution, to check the electrical system. Three of them had come to their house. Kabamur hadn't suspected a thing. But now he saw it with crystal clarity: one of them had installed the cameras.

His stomach tightened. He ran a hand over his forehead and tried to stay calm. He turned to speak to George — but the man was gone.

"George?"

Silence. Kabamur slowly stepped out into the garden. The air was still. The sky, pale from the smoke of the previous night, seemed suspended. And then he saw him.

In the middle of the garden, right where the ancient olive tree stood, George was kneeling — his back straight, his head bowed. In his hand he held a knife. From his left palm, blood was dripping slowly, falling onto the roots of the tree. The leaves of the olive tree, once green and alive, had taken on the color of oil, as if the sap itself had been poisoned.

Kabamur stopped a few meters away from him. He knew. He felt it. A dark presence — not merely negative, but diabolical — had awakened. A cold, ancient, alien vibration.

It did not come from a body. It did not even come from the Earth.
Kabamur felt his breath catch in his chest. It was Pidkozox. It wasn't just a name. It was an ancient consciousness descended into total darkness. According to the Pleiadian texts, Pidkozox was the first being to betray the Light, father of Oppisheklio – the soul that became Lucifer. His desire for absolute power had generated thought-forms so dense that they ended up creating soulless entities, demons capable of possessing, corrupting, and destroying.
Kabamur recognized him not through sight, but through resonance. Frequency. A dark toll within consciousness.
George was not a man. He had never been one. He was a clone, programmed with artificial intelligence – an artificial body created to make room for the worst of beings. At that moment, the consciousness of Pidkozox had been invoked and incarnated through him.
Kabamur didn't move. Every part of his body knew he couldn't treat this event as something human. He had to draw on everything he had learned – all his discipline, his centeredness, his connection to Pure Awareness.
He closed his eyes for an instant. Not to flee. But to enter. He was preparing to fight.

CHAPTER 8

Kabamur was preparing to face one of the most powerful enemies in the entire Galactic Federation. Without hesitation, he would have risked his life to find that crystal. In truth, all starseeds who chose to be reborn on Earth did so, in a sense, moved by a deep feeling of compassion, responsibility, and sacrifice.

At that time, there were about 200 million starseeds on Earth, originating from different densities or dimensions. The planet itself was currently in the third density, characterized by duality.

The evolution of consciousness passed through seven densities: the first was elemental consciousness, in which only the basic elements existed (space, earth, water, fire, air); the second was primitive life – that of plants and animals – which developed movement and instinct; the third density, the human one, was the most critical, because in it the being acquired self-awareness and faced the choice between service to others or service to self, that is, between positive or negative thoughts, between Ego and Unity; the fourth density was that of love and empathic union; the fifth was the density of wisdom, silence, and higher understanding; the sixth integrated love and wisdom within unified consciousness; finally, the seventh density was the one immediately preceding the return to the Creator, where individual identity dissolved into totality, thus completing the evolutionary cycle – becoming one with God, but this time fully conscious.

A starseed chose to incarnate on Earth for two main reasons: on one hand, through their very presence, they increased the vibration of the planet's magnetic field, accelerating the transition toward the Shift; on the other, through the challenges of duality, they could — by choosing wisely — accelerate their own spiritual evolution. Moreover, in the third dimension, the one in which Earth resided, it was even possible to reach complete enlightenment — the dissolution of the Ego into totality.

But there was also the other side of the coin: a starseed, a being from a higher dimension, could, by incarnating on Earth in the third dimension and making the wrong choices, become trapped in egoic decisions and miss the Shift.
When the Shift occurred, the crystals scattered across the planet would emit powerful bursts of light that would resonate only with those pure of heart — or with those who had sincerely striven to do their best. Reality would then divide in two: on one side, the good-hearted people, those who would ascend; on the other, those who had lived wickedly, bringing harm to others. The "ones left behind" would remain in a world where light — that is, the hearts of the pure — no longer existed: a world populated by soulless clones, ruled by the cabal, destined for gradual collapse.
The sadhana contained within the crystal was important for everyone. Indeed, it was true that anyone who had done their best would still pass to the next state, but it was equally true that those who had striven with all their being would receive greater spiritual recognition, drawing even closer to the Divine. As Jesus had said: "The last shall be first." And there was more: those who missed the Shift at first would still be able to ascend later, if they managed to repent deeply — with the heart, not the mind.
As Kabamur reflected on these things, the body vessel of George — within which now resided the soul of Pidkozox — watched him with eyes narrowed to slits. Without uttering a single word, the moment he saw him, he hurled the knife, still stained with blood, straight at him, aiming for his side. The knife had been thrown with superhuman force.

Thanks to his reflexes, Kabamur managed to dodge it by a hair. But there wasn't even a second to lose.

Pidkozox took a few steps forward toward him, raised his hands, and suddenly the ground began to shake. From the palms of his hands, vortices of dark energy began to pour forth, within which writhed malevolent demons and other spectral creatures — ethereal, shifting shapes whose bodies seemed made of solid mist and liquid shadow, with hollow, elongated eyes and wide, soundless mouths that nonetheless conveyed paralyzing anguish. Some appeared to have membranous wings, others curved claws, yet none of them seemed anchored to a stable form: they were mutating, unstable, as if their very existence rejected the coherence of physical reality.

Pidkozox was invoking dark and spectral forces from the astral dimension — exactly as they did at CERN under the evil supervision of the cabal — but in this case, on a localized scale and with concentrated intent.

Kabamur, unlike any other human, felt no fear. He knew he was risking everything. Precisely for that reason, he decided not to use the forces of the elements, as he had done in the battle against Oppisheklio. This time, he would draw upon the light of samadhi.

Samadhi arose when the meditator succeeded in merging completely with the object of their concentration. The object could be something concrete, such as the flame of a candle, or abstract — external to the body, like the visualization of a light — or internal, like one of the known chakras. However, any samadhi that took as its object something other than the "I-thought" did not lead to the realization of the divinity inherent in man.

Only samadhi centered on the "I-thought" could lead to true spiritual evolution.

The reason was simple: the nature of existence — the soul — was nothing other than Pure Consciousness, Neutral Awareness, Objectless Attention, Witnessing without judgment.

Attention itself was God.
He who observed his own thoughts was the Divinity.
When one observed the "I" with the full power of one's attention, that attention — that is, the awareness doing the observing — transformed the "I" into itself: into Pure Awareness. In that process, the Ego, which was nothing other than the "I-thought," was absorbed by the very act of observation, until it dissolved into the universal witness.
But Kabamur had discovered that this act of observation could not be performed with the mind alone. It had to be done with the whole body. By meditating intensely on the "I" — that is, on the very subject of meditation — at a certain point one would feel that the entire body participated.
His mother had taught him this:

"By perceiving the whole body from within as a single field of energy, focus all your attention on the source of the 'I-thought.'"

When this union between the meditator and the object of meditation — in this case, between the observing awareness and the "I-thought" — was realized, it generated an explosive force, similar to that of nuclear energy, along with an immense outpouring of light.
The individual soul, in that instant, by reuniting with universal consciousness, produced a mass of energy almost atomic in nature. But precisely because of this intensity, if the body was not sufficiently trained, that charge could cause a separation between body and soul — or, in material terms, death.
And that was why Kabamur had always been reluctant to use that technique.

But now there was no time for hesitation. Before entering samadhi, Kabamur mentally repeated one of the meditative rhymes composed by Aya:

'Who am I?
Turn your attention within.
Feel your whole body from within as a single field of energy.
Now focus your attention to the thought "I".
Go ever deeper into this feeling: search for the source of the thought "I"."

Kabamur focused every cell of his body on the "I-thought," and in an instant, he felt his entire being fill with light — or rather, become light.

A white, clear radiance enveloped him inside and out, expanding beyond the boundaries of the body, surpassing the skin, dissolving the flesh, erasing every perceptual barrier.

Kabamur's consciousness had become one with that of the Creator. In that state, individuality no longer existed. It was like sleeping deeply, yet remaining aware — a silent wakefulness within the inner night.

In that almost unconscious yet utterly present state, Kabamur gathered the white light in his hands and hurled it with determination toward the vortex of dark energy summoned by Pidkozox.

The two vortices collided in midair with inconceivable power. On one side, the dark, viscous energy — full of distorted voices and spectral shapes that seemed to want to devour light itself; on the other, the pure white luminosity generated by samadhi, concentrated and projected by Kabamur in a state of total fusion with the Self.

At the point of impact, a sharp, deep sound was produced, followed by an explosion that shook the entire garden. The shockwave swept through the space like a tsunami of energy, lifting debris, snapping branches, sending blackened leaves flying through the air, and saturating everything with a high-pitched, almost cosmic whine.

The backlash was devastating.
Kabamur was hurled backward like a weightless body — but it wasn't the physical blow that overwhelmed him; it was the sudden emptiness that followed the extreme use of samadhi. The entire mass of energy that had held him bound to Pure Awareness had discharged in a single gesture, leaving the body drained, emptied, like a vessel from which all spiritual essence had been poured out.
His vision blurred, sounds grew muffled. His knees gave way. And then — darkness.
Kabamur lost consciousness.

CHAPTER 9

Kabamur awoke slowly, as if returning from a long inner journey he still couldn't distinguish from a dream. His body felt light yet emptied, as though every drop of energy had been wrung from every cell. His mind, however, was clear.
Above him, with a gentle and watchful gaze, was Aya. Her hands brushed against him with a tenderness that went beyond motherhood — as if she wanted to make sure his soul had truly returned fully to his body.
"You're awake… finally," she murmured, with a faint smile.
Kabamur looked around. He was in the guesthouse. Golden light filtered through the window, but the air still carried the acrid, lingering smell of smoke.
"How long…?"
"Two days," she replied. "You were sleeping deeply. You needed to recover. The samadhi drained all your reserves. You used more light than a physical body can normally contain."
Kabamur sat up slightly, still dazed. "What happened after? After… the light?"
Aya sat down beside him, taking his hand. She looked at him with love, but also with the weight of what she had to tell him.
"I was still at the fire station when I had a crystal-clear vision. I saw the battle. I saw you surrounded by light, while the dark vortex of Pidkozox tried to swallow you. I felt I had to come immediately. When I arrived home, you were lying on the ground — motionless. But alive. Your light had done something even Pidkozox didn't expect."
Kabamur stared at her, waiting.
"You had destabilized the bond between his soul and the host body. He was convulsing, and the body was failing. I was preparing to destroy it completely… but at that moment Oppisheklio arrived. He approached his father and, without saying a word, hoisted him onto his shoulders. I let him do it."

Kabamur looked at her, his tone halfway between surprise and understanding. "You didn't do anything?"

"No. You were too vulnerable. I couldn't risk an open clash with Oppisheklio in that condition. Letting him have that body was the safest move. I did it to protect you."

Kabamur lowered his gaze. It was always her who could see clearly where he saw only chaos.

At that moment, the phone rang. It was Peter. Judith answered, putting it on speaker.

"Aya... there's something. I went out walking in the woods and... I'm not sure how to explain it. I felt an opening at the crown chakra. It was as if a current of light was flowing through me from above. And then a vision — crystal clear: a pyramidal crystal. It could be one of those connected to the Shift. Or maybe... the Lemurian one."

Judith and Kabamur looked at each other. No words were needed. They set out immediately.

The place Peter had indicated was among the silent hills north of the city, at a spot where the wind seemed to whisper ancient words and the rocks stood watching like motionless guardians. They walked for a while in silence, until Kabamur, without saying a word, sat down cross-legged before a rock wall. In that spot, he too clearly felt an activation at the crown chakra — a subtle, vertical, cosmic call.

He closed his eyes and began the meditation on the element of Space, or Ether.

He let his awareness expand beyond the boundaries of the body, beyond the breath, beyond thought itself. Even perception faded, and attention widened until it became one with the void. Time reset. Form dissolved. The mind became space itself.

Then he felt it — a single point, and only one, that was not empty. It vibrated. It responded. As if it were waiting.
Kabamur opened his eyes. He placed his hand on the wall. The rock vibrated and, effortlessly, opened.
Inside, a silent cave received them. It seemed untouched for millennia. At its center stretched a natural bed of rock crystals — a forest of solid light. The transparent points refracted rainbows in every direction, and the entire space seemed alive, pulsing.
At the center, upon an altar of pure amethyst, stood the Lemurian Crystal. Tall, slender, perfectly geometric, with flawlessly cut faces and living lines that moved almost imperceptibly across its surface. Every engraved symbol seemed to breathe. Its presence was not merely energetic — it was conscious…
Kabamur was about to reach out his hand when he suddenly felt the presence of Pidkozox and Oppisheklio. It was clear they had followed them.
He and Judith turned at once. Their faces were calm, but their bodies already poised.
Oppisheklio appeared more human in bearing, as though trying to seem less threatening. Pidkozox, on the other hand, did not pretend. From him radiated that same alien, cold force — outside of time, outside of heart.
Judith stepped forward. Not aggressively, but with that absolute firmness that only truth can give.
“We have let you act for millennia. Ever since you set foot in Egypt. Always the same game — one of you bearer of darkness, the other pretending to be light. The good and the evil. The righteous and the oppressor. But it was all part of the same design — to divide, to confuse, to deceive.”
Oppisheklio smiled, with a shade of melancholy. “Perhaps… we were wrong.”
Pidkozox snapped his head toward him. “What are you saying?”

“I’m saying we could change. That maybe it’s time to surrender.”
Judith looked into his eyes. And for a moment, she saw something — a crack. Perhaps sincerity.
But an instant later, everything turned upside down.
Oppisheklio uttered something in a primordial, forgotten tongue — a vibration that made the very bones tremble. A dark vortex exploded from him, rushing toward them — a living spiral woven of fear, guilt, and pain, feeding on the collective shadows of humanity. Realizing the deception, Pidkozox joined in, amplifying the assault with his will.
Kabamur and Judith reacted in perfect unison. Their hands rose, and from their palms burst forth the Light of Samadhi — pure, incandescent. The white ray pierced the darkness and clashed with the shadow energy at the heart of the cave.
Light and Shadow. Creation and Destruction. Eternal opposites meeting in their final confrontation.
But the battle held in perfect balance — neither side prevailing — until, to everyone’s astonishment, Peter entered.
“Aya… you know me. I’d never leave you alone with these two performers,” he said with a half-smile.
He took position and closed his eyes. From his body radiated the same White Light — clear, still, perfect — which immediately merged with that of Judith and Kabamur.
The three currents fused into a single column of pure consciousness.
The darkness bent. The bodies of Pidkozox and Oppisheklio dissolved into the light.
For an instant, everything stopped. Time itself seemed suspended.
Then, in a sudden blaze, Kabamur saw with absolute clarity: the Archangel Michael and Elder Ikai, in their higher forms, descending. Their presences were not physical, but projected from the Higher Self. They gathered the souls of the two ancient beings of darkness and enfolded them — not in anger, but in perfect justice.

Judith perceived it all. She followed them with her mind — and understood. Telepathically, she was told:

"They have been taken to the Central Sun. They will begin again, as molecules. Their consciousness will return to the First Density. The soul is never punished — it is brought back to its origin. From there, they must rise once more. From the very beginning."

Soon after, they left the cave, carrying the Lemurian Crystal with them.

They returned to Peter's home. There, in a space prepared with silence, centeredness, and gratitude, Kabamur lay down and placed the crystal on his chest.

The crystal activated — and the sadhana began to emerge.

SADHANA OF SHIFT

To write the following Sadhana I took inspiration mainly from the work of Ramana Maharshi, Eckhart Tolle, Swami Satyananda Saraswati, Shri Shivabalayogi.

PREPARATION

Lie down with your back on the floor and assume the position called SHAVASANA.
In this position, the body is aligned from head to feet, the legs are slightly apart, and the arms are a little away from the body, with the palms of the hands facing upwards.
Adjust the position of your body so that you can then maintain immobility for the entire duration of the practice.
In the following practice, you must try to completely relax the body. It is not necessary to move or deliberately relax the muscles; you simply need to develop the feeling of relaxation. It is the same feeling one feels just before falling asleep. When relaxation becomes deep, sleep may come, but in this case, you must try to remain completely awake.
Therefore, be aware that you are about to begin the practice of YOGA NIDRA. No concentration is necessary, no mental effort. The only important thing is to maintain an uninterrupted flow of awareness throughout the duration of the practice. And for this, you can express the resolve to remain awake and alert for the entire duration of the YOGA NIDRA practice.
Repeat to yourself: “I will remain awake for the entire duration of the YOGA NIDRA practice.”

RELAXATION

And now for a few moments, direct your awareness to external sounds. Start listening to every sound around you, without feeling disturbed by the presence of these sounds. And keep the awareness moving, shifting it from one sound to another, listening to all the sounds present in the external and surrounding environment. Familiarize yourself with these sounds: listen to them intentionally. And now bring the awareness back to your body.
Feel the contact of the body on the floor. Perceive the contact of the clothes on the surface of the body and the feeling that arises from this contact. Perceive the immobility of the entire body, and in the immobility of the body, for a few moments follow the slow rhythmic flow of the breath.

CONNECTION WITH THE INNER BODY

Now try to connect with your inner or internal body. First, become aware of the space occupied by your hands, bring all your attention inside your hands, trying to perceive the space occupied by the hands, as if you were wearing a glove made of skin, and wanted to concentrate your attention on the space inside the glove.
Try to become aware of the feeling of vitality inside your hands, even if initially it might be just tingling. If you keep your attention inside your hands for a while, the feeling of vitality will intensify.
Now move to the feet, keep your attention inside your feet and then start to perceive the hands and feet simultaneously.
Now incorporate the other parts of the body: first the legs, then the arms, the abdomen, the chest, the head, until you become aware of the totality of your body from the inside, as a global sense of vitality, as a single “energy field”.

At this point, try to hold this sensation, the feeling of the whole body from within, throughout the rest of the practice.

OBSERVATION OF THOUGHTS

Now shift your awareness into CIDAKASHA, the space located behind the forehead, between the eyebrows. For a few moments, simply observe this inner space, and then gradually become aware of your thoughts. Do not lose contact with the perception of the inner space of the body, because if you keep your attention inside the body, your thoughts will automatically slow down: part of your attention is directed toward the body and not toward the mind, which consequently becomes weaker.
Observe your thoughts with detachment. Realize now, and forever, this truth: you are not your mind, nor are you any of your thoughts or any of your stories. Everything you have told yourself, about your life, your intentions, your purposes, is a mental construct.
So, if you are not your mind, and you truly become convinced of this, what difference does it make whether your mind is calm or agitated? What difference does it make whether good or bad thoughts arise? You are not your mind.
You are the presence behind the thoughts, the silent observer: you are that which is aware of the thoughts, you are awareness, you are consciousness.
In reality, the mind as an autonomous, separate entity has never truly existed: it is like a rope that appears to be a snake. The snake may seem to exist, but in truth it has always been only a rope. To make the illusion disappear, you must stop believing in it, you must stop believing that you are your mind! “I am not the mind, the mind does not exist. Only consciousness exists, and I am That!" If you hold this firm conviction that this alone is the truth, one day that firm conviction will ripen to the point of becoming your direct experience.

Continue to observe your thoughts with detachment. Do not judge any of them. Keep watching them from a distance, without labeling them as good or bad, right or wrong.

Struggling against your thoughts only strengthens them. The secret to gaining mastery over the mind is to observe your thoughts from afar, treating them like external sounds, without identifying with them, without giving them a sense of "me" or identity. Pretend your thoughts are butterflies: butterflies are flying around your head and you gently brush them away, delicately, without any intention of harming them!

As long as you consider your thoughts important, you will not be able to disidentify from them. Therefore, do not give them importance! When you no longer regard your thoughts as important, when you stop believing the voice inside your head, you automatically deprive them of energy.

The mind will always try to deceive you, as though the chief of police were himself the bandit! The mind, the ego, is a kind of phantom that has taken possession of you, feeding on your attention and energy. You cannot fight a phantom that ultimately does not exist, doing so would only reinforce the illusion. You can only let the phantom die by ceasing to believe the stories that keep repeating on the gramophone inside your head.

Not giving attention or importance to your thoughts is like stopping watering a plant: sooner or later it will dry up and die.

It is only your interest in the voice inside your head, that is, your thoughts, that keeps the mind alive! If you completely lose interest in your mental content, very soon the mind will evaporate, leaving space for your true essence: formless awareness.

So allow thoughts to arise however they want, while continuing to observe them with detachment. If some image emerges from the unconscious, let it appear without trying to change it, simply watch it arise and then disappear, without dwelling on it, without giving it attention (that is, energy). Keep gently brushing the thoughts away as if they were butterflies, while remaining present inside the space of your whole body.
Now, instead of brushing the butterflies away, imagine that as soon as they land on your body they simply evaporate.
A thought-butterfly appears in your energy field, that is, in your inner perception of the body, and the moment it lands it turns into smoke and evaporates.
Another thought-butterfly manifests in your awareness and immediately evaporates.
At a certain point all the thought-butterflies have vanished into nothingness, turned into smoke. Now, where is the thinker?
Search for the one who is thinking. Direct your attention toward the thinker.
Has he perhaps vanished along with the last butterfly? If the thinker is still present within you, continue with YOGA NIDRA.

EXPERIENCING ENLIGHTENMENT

Now formulate your resolve: “May I attain enlightenment for the benefit of all sentient beings, because all sentient beings have been like mothers to us in the infinite cycle of life.”

Supreme happiness is the absence of all desire. Actually, happiness is the freedom to observe one's desires with detachment, without being forced to pursue them. Not all desires must be discarded: the desires to avoid are only those bound by craving for external objects. The desire that arises during one's natural functions, devoid of craving, does not lead to bondage. How could a man meditate if he were continually hungry, continually cold, or continually needing to go to the bathroom?

That said, learn to use the power of desire to your advantage, which is the fuel of the universe itself. How?

Desire right now, with all of yourself, liberation, enlightenment. Enlightenment, in fact, is seeking you with the same identical intensity as you are seeking it.

Desire with all of yourself enlightenment.

To attain enlightenment, it would certainly be easier to renounce everything, go to a monastery and meditate all day; however, there is a reason why the Absolute, which is you yourself, has decided this life for you. Even if it is difficult, learn to remain detached from everything, without desires, while living in the world.

To be sure of the sincerity of your detachment, ask yourself this question: “For enlightenment, right now, would I be willing to go live in a monastery – renouncing all my possessions and my relatives – to meditate all day? For enlightenment, would I be willing to die right now?”

But what is enlightenment? Enlightenment is the total annihilation of everything you think you are. Enlightenment is never of the person, but it is the total disappearance of individuality. It is the disappearance of the seeker, the ultimate disappointment of the ego. So, try to die now. Let your ego die now. Not in a year, a day, a month. Now. Right now. Right in this moment.

You are on your deathbed, your soul is about to leave your body, it is about to fly away towards the only impersonal consciousness. You are disappearing: your past, with all your stories, no longer exists. Your future, with all your hopes and fears, has just dissolved. You are about to leave all your possessions, you are about to leave all your relatives, you are about to leave everything and everyone. Your very physical form and all the mental constructs you have clung to throughout your existence are disappearing.

There, now you are dead, there is nothing left, there is no one left. Your body has disappeared, yet your presence is still there, radiant and fully aware.
Therefore, turn your attention to yourself, to your own radiant awareness, and immerse yourself, here and now, in the infinite ocean of spirit. Take your I, your sense of self, and drown it completely in the sea of consciousness. Expand your being completely beyond every boundary, beyond every place, without maintaining any point of reference. Dissolve like snow in the sun, becoming one with space, without opposing any resistance.
Have you become enlightened? Have you at least managed to experience an instant of pure awareness, of consciousness without thoughts?
If you have not succeeded, continue with YOGA NIDRA.

PERCEPTION OF THE BODY FROM THE INSIDE

Bring all your attention inside the feet, feel them from within as a single field of energy. Perceive the space occupied by your feet, the vital energy present inside them.
Now shift your attention to the space occupied by your legs: from the ankles up to the pelvis. Feel your legs from within, as a single sensation. Bring all your attention, all your awareness, inside your legs.
Now shift your attention to the lower part of the torso: in the abdomen, the hips, the belly. Perceive this entire area of the body from the inside; flood the space occupied by the lower torso with awareness.

Now move your attention upward, toward the upper part of the torso. Perceive the entire chest from the inside, as a single energy field. Let the attention penetrate deeply into this perception: the perception of the space occupied by your chest.
Now go to the hands. Feel/perceive the space occupied by your hands, become aware of the subtle sensation of vitality within them. Feel from within all the fingers distinctly, with awareness diffused throughout the entire space occupied by the hands.
Now it's time for the arms. Perceive both your arms, from the wrists up to the shoulders, from the inside. Let your awareness spread within the entire space occupied by the arms.
Now perceive the vital energy contained inside the head. Perceive the entire head from the inside as a single energy field.
Now let your attention scan the entire body like a wave, three times, from the feet to the head and then back again. Let awareness enter the toes of both feet and, slowly, feeling the body from within, let the awareness flow upward: up through the ankles, calves, knees, thighs. In the pelvis, reunite the awareness that has ascended through the two legs.
Then, beginning to perceive the fingers of the hands as well, let the awareness rise upward, like a trident, through the two hands and the torso. The awareness rises simultaneously in the belly and the forearms, passes through the chest and the upper arms. At the height of the shoulders, the awareness from the hands and that from the torso unite, continuing to rise up to the top of the head.

Now feel the whole body from within, in its totality, as a single field of energy. Become intensely present in every cell of your body.
Now that the feeling of the body from within has stabilized, that your attention is diffused simultaneously in every cell of your body as a single feeling, bring your attention even deeper into this feeling. Become one with it. Merge with the energy field of your body, so that there is no longer duality between observer and observed, between you and your body.
Now you are completely immersed in the ocean of spirit, in the feeling of the whole body from within. There is no longer any separation: there is only this awareness, this silence, that you yourself are.

OBSERVATION OF EMOTIONS

Previously, you practiced the observation of thoughts; now it is time to practice the observation of emotions. According to Eckhart Tolle, the mind – that entity that inhabits your consciousness and is formed by a set of thoughts and stories intertwined around the idea of the "I" – does not include only thoughts, but also emotions. Emotions, explains the spiritual master, arise at the point where mind and body meet and represent a reflection of the mind in the body. A thought of hatred toward someone, for example, produces in the body a charge of energy called anger.
Emotions are often an amplified and energized set of thoughts, that is, the physical expression of one of the many inner narratives you tell yourself. A set of thoughts linked, for example, to the fear of not being up to par at work – like "I might make a mistake," "maybe I'm not capable enough," "others will notice" – creates in the body a specific sensation, which in this case manifests as anxiety. And the more unaware you are, the more the flow of thoughts and the emotion that accompanies them empower each other, giving rise to a vicious cycle. Continuing to ruminate on the situation that originated the emotion intensifies it; at the same time, the emotion, manifesting in the body, fuels further thoughts that add to the initial ones.

As with thoughts, emotions should also be observed with detachment. However, in the practice of observing emotions, the connection with the inner body becomes even more important. It is as if the emotion, born from a network of thoughts, deposits itself in the cells of the body. After all, thoughts and emotions are nothing but forms of vibration, and the cells of the body also vibrate: this is why it is not surprising that they can interact so deeply with each other.
To practice, bring your attention inward, feeling your whole body from within as a single energy field. Feel the energy of the emotion and let it be as it is, while maintaining a certain inner distance. There is you, the power of your presence, and there is the energy of the emotion. In this way, gradually, the emotion transforms into pure conscious energy. In fact, everything that is exposed to the light of consciousness, that is, to attention, becomes consciousness itself.

SHELL MEDITATION

Now begin to experience your body in the form of a shell, a shell empty inside. The shell of the shell is your skin: a skin of crystal, of transparent glass, like that of a bottle. The space inside your body is black. The space outside, around you, is black.
Now begin to experience the internal space that permeates your entire body. Experience the space of the entire body.

It is the same space that pervades the upper part of the body and that also pervades the lower part of your body.
Look inside and see space: the space of the entire body. Experience the space that pervades the whole body, from the top of the head to the tips of the fingers of the hands, to the tips of the toes.
Develop awareness of the body as a shell, permeated with space inside, enveloped by space outside. And, as you become aware of this space, experience the sensations of calm, silence, and immobility, associated with the awareness of the internal space of the body.

BREATHING

Now begin to develop awareness of the breath and expand this awareness to the surface of the entire body. Your entire body is inhaling, your entire body is exhaling. Experience the breath of the entire body and with each inhalation associate the sensation of expansion, with each exhalation the sensation of relaxation.
Inhale and experience the expansion of the entire internal space. Exhale and experience the relaxation of the entire internal space.
Expansion and relaxation to the rhythm of the breath.
And with the inhalation perceive the expansion and feel the internal space fill with PRANA and energy. With each inhalation be aware of the prana that penetrates the body. See particles of light, rays of light moving in all directions within the internal space of the body. With each inhalation the internal space expands with light and energy, with each exhalation it relaxes.

THE FIVE PRANAS

Let go of the awareness of the breath, starting to develop awareness of VYANA in the form of points of light and rays of light that move in every direction within the entire body. Your entire body from the top of the head to the toes is permeated with particles of light, flows of light that move in every direction.

Now begin to develop awareness of UDANA in the extremities of the body. See UDANA moving within the legs, within the arms, within the head in the form of circles of light. See circular movements of light and energy in all the extremities of the body. Experience UDANA in the form of a circular flow of energy.

Now begin to develop the experience of SAMANA in the abdominal region between the navel and the diaphragm. SAMANA is an energy that moves laterally. Visualize waves of light moving from left to right, from right to left. See waves of light filling the entire abdomen from the navel to the diaphragm with lateral movements.

Now become aware of PRANA, of the movement of energy within the chest area, from the diaphragm to the larynx. See waves of light, like ocean waves, flowing upward during inhalation from the diaphragm to the neck and then flowing downward with exhalation. Experience waves of light that permeate the entire chest area.

Finally, develop the perception of APANA, located between the navel and the perineum, in the lower abdomen. Experience APANA as a wave, as a flow of luminous energy that moves downward, from the navel to the perineum with each inhalation, and then upward with each exhalation. Intensify the awareness of the movement of APANA between the navel and the perineum.

5 ELEMENTS

Now leave this form of awareness and begin to awaken in yourselves the perception of the five main elements or TATTWA: starting with the earth element and then proceeding with the water, fire, air, and ether elements.
The image that represents the EARTH element is given by a square of yellow light. And you can see or imagine this yellow square located in the physical area between the knees and the feet. See the four sides of the square, symbol of stability. Develop the perception of this yellow square located between knees and feet. See it clearly in its shape and color.
And now mentally begin to repeat the mantra associated with the EARTH element, the mantra LAM. Repeat it rhythmically and with awareness a few times: LAM, LAM, LAM.
Leave the repetition of the mantra and begin to awaken the perception of the WATER element. This element is represented by a crescent moon slice placed horizontally in the form of white light between the knees and the navel. You can see this crescent moon slice between the knees and the navel. See the outlines of this moon slice, symbol of fluidity. Develop the perception of the crescent moon symbol. See it clearly in its shape and color.
And now mentally begin to repeat the mantra associated with the water element, the mantra VAM. Repeat it rhythmically and with awareness: VAM, VAM, VAM.
Leave the repetition of the mantra and now awaken the perception of the FIRE element. This element is represented by a triangle of red light with the vertex pointing downward. You can see this inverted red triangle in the area located between the navel and the heart. See the sides of this red light triangle, symbol of great heat. Through this element, energy manifests in the form of light and heat. Develop the perception of the FIRE element in the form of an inverted red triangle located between navel and heart. See it clearly in its shape and color.

And maintaining this image, mentally begin to repeat the mantra associated with the fire element, the mantra RAM. Repeat it rhythmically and with awareness: RAM, RAM, RAM.
Leave the repetition of the mantra and begin to awaken the perception of the AIR element. This element is represented by a sky-blue hexagon. Its nature is movement. It is located in the area between the heart and the center between the eyebrows. You can also see it in the form of 6 points of blue light that give rise to a hexagonal shape. See the air element in the form of a sky-blue hexagon between the heart and the center between the eyebrows. See it clearly in its shape and color.
And maintaining this image, begin the mental repetition of the mantra associated with the air element, the mantra YAM. Repeat it rhythmically and with awareness: YAM, YAM, YAM.
Leave the repetition of the mantra and develop the perception of the ETHER element. The ETHER element which is pure energy, which is the space in which matter becomes manifest. This element is located at the top of the head, from the center between the eyebrows all around the top of the head. See the ETHER element in the form of a large black circle permeated inside by a multitude of multicolored points. Visualize the circle and the multicolored points within it. See it clearly in its shape and colors. And now begin to repeat the mantra associated with the ether element, the mantra HAM. Repeat it rhythmically and consciously: HAM, HAM, HAM.
Now concentrate on pure consciousness, unbound from any image. Direct all your attention to pure consciousness, awareness without object, while feeling your whole body from within. Feel your own presence, try to become one with pure consciousness. Immerse yourself in pure consciousness and begin to repeat the mantra OM, remembering this time that pure consciousness is nothing but the source of the mantra itself. Repeat it rhythmically and consciously: OM, OM, OM. Try to merge with the source of the mantra, to become one with it.

You will become everything you believe you are in your heart: stop considering yourselves as humans and start thinking of yourselves as divine. You are God, you are Brahman, never forget it. Stop believing in your story, of being just any ordinary person. Whatever your condition, social and economic, do not forget to consider yourselves divine, to always consider yourselves as the Supreme Being. You are the source of the mantra, you are the OM diffused throughout the universe!

INNER SPACE

Now suspend the process and transfer your awareness to CHIDAKASHA in the space located behind the forehead. For a few moments observe this inner space and everything that expresses or manifests in CHIDAKASHA emerging from the depths of your mind, as in the following meditation:

Close your eyes.
Concentrate the mind and the gaze between the eyebrows.
Do not move eyelids or eyebrows.
Continue to look at the point between the eyebrows focusing your attention there.
Do not repeat any mantra or name.
Do not imagine anything.

Continue to look inside the space between the eyebrows, allowing any image or thought to appear and then disappear.
When the waves of images and thoughts have calmed, without diverting your gaze ask yourself:

Who is watching?
Concentrate your attention on the one who is watching.
Meditate on the meditator.

WHO AM I?

That said, continue with YOGA NIDRA and prepare for the final meditation.
Turn your mind inward and ask yourself the following question: "Who am I?"
You do not need to find an answer to this question. Rather, with your attention turned toward yourself, try to grasp your sense of I.
Ask yourself: "Now, what is this thing that arises as 'I'?"
Then, in your Heart, a sort of wordless illumination should shine in the form of "I-I". The sensation of Pure Consciousness should shine in your heart.
What you think you are has nothing to do with your possessions, the work you do, your social status, your education, knowledge… it has nothing to do with your physical appearance, your "special abilities", your relationships, your personal or family history, your belief system, whether political, nationalistic, racial, or religious… all this is not you… you are not even your body, your name.
"Who am I?"
Focus your attention inward, inside yourself, in search of the origin of the thought, the feeling, of the I.

If you still haven't managed to find anything, mentally repeat “I, I”.
Grasp what you have managed to find, what inside you corresponds to the feeling of I, and cling to this sensation.
If other thoughts should arise, do not pursue them, do not give them energy. No matter how important they may seem, they are just thoughts, they are like the song of the sirens, they try to deceive you and make you think they are important, but they are just thoughts.
“Who am I?”
Focus your attention on the source of the thought “I”. If other thoughts arise, simply discard them, do not give them attention, and return to the feeling, to the source of the I. If you cannot easily return to the inner sensation of the “I” because you have so many thoughts in your head, ask yourself: “To whom do these thoughts arise?” The implicit answer will be: “To me”. Then ask yourself again: “Who am I?” In this way, the mind will return again to its source.
Therefore, in every way, try not to give space to the thoughts that arise, trying to eliminate them at the root, bringing your attention back to the source of the I thought. If you give them even the slightest space, the thoughts would multiply endlessly, in endless chains of concepts. Eliminate the chain of thought at the root, focusing your awareness on the source of the sensation of the I.
Ramana Maharshi said:

“Like a diver who plunges into deep water to recover a sunken treasure, controlling the voice and breath, feeling the whole body from within as a single energy field, one should plunge deeply into oneself in search of the source of the ‘I’ thought.”

Put this instruction into practice and begin to feel your whole body from within, as a single energy field.

Become aware of the whole body as a single sensation, a single perception. At the same time, focus all your attention on the thought “I”. Automatically, the perception of the whole body will narrow to a single point, the source of the thought “I”. In reality, the source of the thought “I” and the feeling of the body from within are the same thing, awareness unbound from form, even though the perception of the entire space of the body probably has more to do with relaxation, while attention to the source of the I thought has more to do with concentration.

Now, therefore, all the light of your presence, all your awareness is concentrated on the thought “I”.

Ignore any thoughts that may arise in the meantime and continue to immerse yourself in the depths of yourself, to pursue the thought “I”.

Deeper and deeper inside yourselves, closer and closer, more united with the thought “I”. Seek the source of the I thought, seek the place from which the thought “I” emerges.

Breathe naturally, remembering however that the sages associate inhalation with the search for the I, the pause between inhalation and exhalation with natural abiding in the Self, and exhalation with the abandonment of the idea “I am the body”.

Therefore, while inhaling, try to go deeper and deeper: immerse yourself ever deeper inside yourselves, focusing with even greater intensity on the thought “I”. When you hold your breath and then exhale again, do not lose the source of the I thought, hold it tightly in your mind.

In Hatha Yoga, it is said that one should stretch to one's maximum and then try to stretch a little more. In the same way, try to get as close as you can to the thought “I”, and then go a little deeper. The more the force of attention on the source of the thought “I” increases, the more the thought “I” narrows. The thought “I”, in fact, is nothing but a reflected ray of consciousness and, unlike other thoughts, which are devoid of consciousness, it is always directly connected to its source, pure consciousness. Therefore, when your attention immerses itself deeper and deeper along the reflected ray of the thought “I”, the length of the reflection, that is, the thought “I”, decreases more and more, until it disappears completely.

Therefore, remain like this for a few moments, anchored to the source of the sensation of the “I”.
Finally, remember that meditation must be constant; in reality, you yourselves must become the meditation, you must become the meditation technique. In every moment of the day, therefore, remember to synchronize mind and body, that is, remember to feel the whole body from within as a single energy field while simultaneously concentrating all your attention on the thought “I”.

CONCLUSION

Now bring your awareness back to your body, to the entire shape and position of the body, feel again the contact with the floor, perceive your inner condition. Review yourselves in the environment in which you find yourselves. Begin again to listen to the external sounds. The YOGA NIDRA practice is now concluded. Begin gently and slowly to move every area of your body. Take your time and when you are ready, reopen your eyes and return to sitting.

